Bystander Choices: Can We Help People Who Are Bullied?

A student approaches you at recess and tells you a story about the mother of one of the friends in your group. She asks you to spread this rumor around to as many people as you can.

In class, the student sitting next to you deliberately knocks her own pencil case onto the floor, then calls out: "Hey, stop it." When the teacher asks what is going on, the student says that you keep knocking her pencil case off the desk every day, and she is sick of it.

You are playing on the playground with a group of your friends. Another student comes up to the group and asks to join in. One of the students in your group says, "No way. None of us like you. Get lost."

At recess, you and your friend are practicing a routine with a jump rope. Another student is making a video using her mobile phone. Your friend trips over during the routine, is very embarrassed, and starts to cry. The student with the mobile phone laughs hysterically, keeps the video going, and then posts the video on YouTube.
