Types of Bullying Memory Game (Situation)

At almost every soccer practice, a player kicks you in the shins.	In science class, whenever you ask the teacher a question, the student next to you laughs and calls you stupid.	Every time you arrange to go to the movies with Jessica, she calls and cancels, saying she needs to see someone else.	Every time you try out for a sports team, another player trips you, laughs at you, and tells everyone you can't play sports.
Every day you are getting anonymous text messages from someone declaring that he or she is going to "get you."	Every day at recess when you try to join in a game of four square, the group pushes you aside and tells you to get lost.	At least three times a week another student steals your bag and throws it onto the roof of the school.	Every day, a student walking past kicks the leg of your chair, toppling it—and you—over.
Every time you get out your math textbook, Brody scribbles on it with a permanent marker.	You often play basketball at lunchtime. Whenever you miss a shot, one of your teammates starts yelling mean things.	Someone keeps putting the same note in your bag every day telling you she is going to beat you up after school.	Each afternoon on the school bus, you try to sit next to another student, but she always puts her bag on the seat to block you.
Regularly in the lunch line, an older student asks to borrow some money. When you refuse, he pulls you around the corner and pins you against the wall and threatens you.	A group of students discusses the local sports team every morning before school. When you try to join in the conversation, the students roll their eyes, turn their backs, and ignore you.	Each morning when you walk to school, a group of older students teases you about something. This time it's about your new haircut.	A different, nastily Photoshopped picture of you is emailed around your class every day.
