When It's OK to Say "No"

An older student emails you at your school email address asking you for your lunch money.	A girl who is not part of your group emails you an invitation to her birthday party. You don't want to go, but you don't want to hurt her feelings.
Your friend writes you a note asking you to meet him at the local playground after school.	A stranger asks you to get in his car.
Your best friend brings some matches to school and asks you to burn some leaves with her.	The bus driver asks to see your ticket.
Another student picks on you, and a group forms around both of you. Students chant "fight, fight, fight." You do not want to look afraid in front of your friends.	In your group of friends, one student wants to skip school for the day. All of your other friends say "yes."
